

HUGH DAILEY HOUSE

176 West Main Street

This recently restored red brick house faces the north side of West Main Street about 100' east of that street's intersection with Union Street in Westminster. It, and the Pinehart-Wantz House across the street (170 West Main Street), may be the quintessential late-Victorian domestic buildings in the City. This house consists of two gable-roofed perpendicular sections, each measuring 3-bays-by-2-bays, and each being two stories (plus an attic) tall. However, the success of this facade, and of the house in general, is perhaps, more dependent on trim than on essential forms. The principal facade is crowned by a very tall, molded, white, wooden cornice which has pairs of modillion-size brackets placed alternately with the windows, and rows of dentils strung between these brackets; but the whole cornice exists not for these decorations on its underside, but for its height and its stark whiteness. Windows on this facade are decorated with white louvered shutters, white wooden sills and tall, slightly-flared, bracketed cornices. The four-panel Victorian ground floor door opens onto a broad brick porch; its hipped roof and thick, plain, white cornice are supported by equally thick, brick posts; brick is also used in the porch's foundation, and in creating a solid railing. The porch swings around and also shades the building's east wall, which is blind but for two, four-light, attic windows located in the gable.

DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The red brick house of Hugh Dailey faces the north side of West Main Street (St. Route 32) about 100 feet east of that street's intersection with Union Street in Westminster. It, and the Pinehart-Wantz House across the street (no. 179 West Main Street) may be the quintessential late-Victorian domestic buildings in Westminster. The Dailey house consists of two, gable-roofed, perpendicular sections, each measuring three bays by two bays, and each being two stories (plus an attic) tall. The sections sit on low fieldstone foundations, and below tin roofs.

The south (principal) facade consists of 5 double-hung, six over six windows and an eastern ground floor door. All bays are aligned. This is the facade reduced to basics. However, the success of this facade, and of the house in general, is, perhaps, more dependant on trim than on essential forms. The facade is crowned by a very tall, molded, white wooden cornice which has pairs of brackets (more the size of modillions) placed alternately with the windows, and rows of dentils strung between these brackets: but the cornice exists not for these decorations on its underside, but for its height and its stark whiteness. Windows on this facade are decorated by white louvered shutters, white wooden sills, and tall, slightly-flared bracketed cornices. (All this ornamentation is also painted white.) The door is a four-panel Victorian door (its upper panels are taller and have rounded arches at their tops) surrounded by two-light sidelights and a two-light transom, all of which is recessed a few inches behind broad smooth pilasters. The door opens onto a broad brick porch, whose hipped roof and thick, plain white cornice are supported by equally thick brick posts; brick is also used in the porch's foundation, and to create the solid railing (a railing which is given some interest by having centrally recessed panels of brick). The porch swings around and also shades the building's east wall, which is blind but for two 4-light attic windows located in the gable.

The rear section of the building is as broad as the front section, creating a rectangular, not an L, floor plan. The front third of the addition is fully recessed forming a two-story recessed porch, which is approached by simple doors. This rear east facade has two 6/6 windows above a four-panel door and a northern 6/6 window. The door has some of the light enrichment of the south facade's bays, but the windows only have white wooden sills and three course gauged flat arches. The west facade of the Main Street section has 6/6 windows placed towards the front of the facade (one per floor); like the windows on the other less important facades these, too, are less elaborately treated, having white wooden sills and three course gauged flat arches, although the ground floor window does have white louvered shutters. A pair of 4-light attic windows matches the pair found on the east facade. A corbel-capped inside chimney rises at the west facade's gable end, at the roof's peak.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

It was stated in question 7 that this may well be a "quint-essential late-Victorian Westminster House". It continued the then - century-old - two-sectioned form, was built the requisite three-bay width, and has the fairly standard rear two-story recessed porch. Moreover, the firmness of the principal facade's trim makes the house striking: its thick, rich, roof cornice, as well as the trim of the 6/6 windows. Even the use of 6/6 windows, rather than 1/1 or 2/2, is important here in that it adds just a little more whiteness - in mullions and transoms - and movement to a facade that desires both. Simply put, the house is a gem. Also interesting, is the relationship it creates with the Rinehart-Wantz house across the street (q.v.). As no. 176 is one of the finest small late-Victorian houses in the City, so no. 170 is one of the finest large traditional houses. But their relationship goes beyond this: they share the same brick, white trim color scheme, they share the same wooden decoration, and they both use porches well. The porch, here at no. 176, works on several levels - of course it provides shade and a sitting place, but it also, extending as it does to the east, serves other functions as well: it extends that length the house would, have if the house had been built, five, not three, bays wide.

Isaac Shriver, who laid out a large tract of land in the west end of Westminster, sold a three acre plus parcel to Jacob Mearing on March 8, 1843 for $468.75 (Carroll County Deed Book JS 2, Page 138). Mearing's executors, Christian Royer and Emanuel Koontz, sold a part of this three acre tract to Jacob Morelock on September 30, 1867; the tract measured 111' on West Main Street, and was sold for $400 (35/107). Four years later, Morelock sold the same piece to Hugh Dailey who probably built the existing house (40/217, dated September 23, 1871). The house shows up on the 1877 plat of the City, and Dailey is listed as living there in the 1887 City Directory. He reserved a life estate in the house when he sold the place to John W. Dailey on October 11, 1892 for $2500 (75/357). Dailey suffered a loss when he sold the place to William G. Rinehart - who lived at and built no. 170 West Main Street - on March 31, 1903 for $1500 (97/268), but Rinehart made a profit when he sold the place a year later on April 4, 1904 to Leander Gladhill for $2150 (100/22). The house stayed in the Gladhill family until June 30, 1927, when Angie B. Gladhill sold to Etta B. Stewart (201/33); Etta's marital status changed, as she was later known as Etta
